Description

"Stanley Greenberg's photographs of architectural sites contemplate form and content in the context of contemporary urban existence. He describes his approach as follows: 'I look at photographs for the information they contain. I know that their record is not necessarily a mandate for truth, but I want them to tell me what they can beyond the act of the creation of the image and the production of the resulting prints. It's an old fashioned way of looking, for what has happened in the visual arts generally has also happened specifically in photography: style and attitude have supplanted the photographers' first call to record and document the world before them.'"
