

Shabti of Iry

Date

c. 945-715 B.C.E.

Medium

Faience with pigment

Description

In the Egyptian afterlife, everyone was expected to work in the Field of Reeds (or A'aru) for Osiris, the god of death. Shabtis first began appearing in tombs of the Middle Kingdom (ca. 2040 – 1782 B.C.E.), likely evolving from the wooden models of servants and workers that were included in Old and Middle Kingdom burials. At first, they were only mummyiform and most were placed in their own coffins. Most remained uninscribed, but some included the name of their owners or fractions of the shabti spell from Chapter 6 of the Book of the Dead. By the New Kingdom, shabtis had come to personify the deceased and perform labor on their behalf in the A'aru. They were made of predominantly clay and faience, and painted with agricultural implements such as sickles, hoes, baskets, and brick molds for working in the A'aru. Most tombs contain at least a few shabtis. Over time, it became more common to include 365 worker shabtis (one for each day of the year) and 36 overseers (one for every 10 worker shabtis) in wealthier tombs, totaling 401. This 22nd Dynasty shabti (ca. 945 – 715 B.C.E.) was excavated from Cemetery D in Abydos sometime between 1899 – 1902, and donated to the College by William C. Winslow in 1902. It has been attributed to Iry, but unfortunately, little is known about Iry. Catalogue card from 1960s: "Ushabti - Faience. Egyptian, XXIst-XXVth Dyns. Gift W. C. Winslow '62. Prov.: ?Egypt. Foot knocked off. Cream-colored fabric; turquoise glaze; purplish black paint; eyes painted black; fillet on wig; hands crossed, holding hoes; painted columnar inscription.

Dimensions

Overall: 4 1/8 × 1 1/2 in. (10.5 × 3.8 cm)